"RIO GRANDE REVENGE"

The small Polin ranch was now nothing but smoldering ruins. Sheriff Al Dares and the members of his posse had made a quick search for signs of life.

"Every one of them dead," announced deputy John Gould. "They must have fought to the last bullet. The raiders got Lou Polin, his wife, Sam Barter, and Harry Taylor. Can't tell how many of the raiders they got in return. How long do we have to stand for this kind of murder? What's happened to us? My grandpa died in the Alamo for Texas. Just say the word sheriff, and we'll ride across the Rio Grande and blast Marc Baro and his gang to kingdom come!"

There was at least one small consolation to the entire tragic affair. Little Jimmy Polin, age five, was still alive. Mrs. Hatty Wilston who ran the hotel in town had taken him there for a birthday party of her little girl. And rather than ride back with the child late at night to the ranch she had tucked him safely in bed. Were it not for that fact, there would have been five corpses instead of four.

"I know how every one of you fellows feel about these killers," announced the sheriff. "They think they have some kind of immunity because they are on the other side of the border. They make a quick raid here, kill people, and take livestock. Sure they feel they are safe. Well, at the moment, what can we do? If we ride into Mexico there will be a heap of trouble between the two countries. And if we go by ourselves, then we got to fight the Buertes in addition to that gang."

"I got a simple solution," shouted Jed Kane, one of the cowboys who had joined the posse. "Let Texas secede from the United States. Then we'll be an independent republic again. Organize a Texan army and wipe out that gang."

"Back to town boys," said the sheriff. "John will stay here and take care of things. I'll send the undertaker out. There should be a decent burial. Maybe we can get the public to arouse that they will hear us in Washington and do something about this."

On the other side of the Rio Grande, within a stone's throw of the river, Marc Baro had made his headquarters. He was wanted for murder in Nevada and Colorado as well as in Texas. He had become a Mexican citizen and built up a small private army recruited from cutthroats. But Marc Baro posed as a sort of Robin Hood to the Mexicans. He was always careful to distribute some of the raided stock to the peasants.

"Senor Marc Baro is a very good man," was the way Pedro Gonzales expressed the sentiment of many of his people. "He only robs the rich to help the poor."

But back across the Rio Grande in the United States, Mrs. Hatty Wilston was expressing her thoughts in no uncertain words.

"Al Dares," she told the men she liked. "Don't start lecturing me about laws. They mean nothing to Marc Baro and his gang. The world knows that Texans are the best shots. So what's delaying the shooting? Could only be one thing. You're yellow."

The sheriff's ears heard these insulting words. But his eyes were at that moment watching little Jimmy Polin. The child was having the time of his life. He was making mud pies. And building some little forts. He would dump water from his pail and make a little miniature river. With his small fingers he would dig a channel, then let the water run through it. A peculiar smile appeared on the sheriff's face.

"They say there is a day of reckoning for every man," he replied slowly. "I think I know how to beat Marc Baro and his gang. I am going to speak to Ed Reid and Herb Alexander."

Ed Reid and Herb Alexander owned the two largest ranches in the county. Both men had lost stock to Marc Baro and his gang. Just now the sheriff was in Ed Reid's ranch house speaking to Ed Reid and Herb Alexander.

"You two have a lot of good hard riding and straight shooting cowboys working for yog. If I led a group against the Marc Bero stronghold, would you be willing to fight with me?"

Herb Alexander had been a lawyer in New England before he had come down to Texas and bought a ranch with the money left to him by his father.

"Sheriff," he replied, "I know you are a law abiding man. You must be cooking up some kind of a legal scheme. You sure can have our boys, and we'll go with you too. But don't fool yourself. He has a little fort down there on the other side of the Rio Grande. Built with nice thick stones. The bullets will never go through."

"I know all about that," said the sheriff. "I think I can convince Major Bendings at the fort to lend us one of his small cannons. With sufficient powder and shot we'll reduce the fort in no time. But I need about three thousand dollars. Have to hire a fellow. He's the one who will take care that what we do is perfectly legal."

Major Bendings wasn't a fool. He knew that the sheriff didn't want the canon for a celebration.

"Legally, I can't lend it to you," he explained. "Military rules cover that. However, I can permit you to take an old canon, one that needs some repairs. You must return it in a week, and I hope in good shooting order. I'll make you sign a paper stating you can fix the canon. That will cover us at the fort." And then he added one more sentence. "Just in case your expedition against Marc Bero starts some trouble. But I have a feeling you know what you are doing."

Success had fattened Marc Bero. He sat outside of his little fort and listened to one of his best spies, Si Lingo.

"They are planning a raid against us," said the agitated man. "Everyone is talking about it. What are we going to do?"

"This is our castle and fort," replied the outlaw without any fear in his voice. "We could withstand any fighting group of cowboys. Just ride to Captain Velazquez of the Rurales. Tell him as a citizen of Mexico I demand protection and to send some of his troops within a short riding distance of my place."

For a week the weather had been very warm. The Rio Grande at this particular spot looked something like a puddle. One could ride across it without even splashing the water. Then on a Wednesday night it became cloudy and dark. Howard J. Person had come from

New Orleans for this particular job.

"That's the weather we want, sheriff. I'll get the men at work within an hour. If everything works out as planned, you can start your operations by sunrise tomorrow morning."

Every member of the Bero gang was in the little fort. There was enough ammunition and food to last a long siege. Men were posted at the thin slits that served as windows and firing ports.

"I hear hoofbeats," said Marc Bero. "They asked for trouble and they will get it. We'll kill them and prove they crossed the border into Mexico."

But the rising sun did not shine as the Rio Grande in front of the little fort. The river was now in back of the stone house. And ringing it were hundreds of well armed cowboys and law men. And the canon was loaded ready to fire. Sheriff Al Dares rode his mount mid stream to meet Captain Velazquez.

"You will observe, captain, that we are on American territory. All land north of the Rio Grande is in our country. All land south is in Mexico. Is that not true?"

Captain Velazquez was an honorable man. He hated Marc Bero and his gang of killers. The Rurales had given protection only in the form of preventing any group from the United States crossing the river. He had but one sentence to offer.

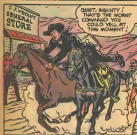

"It is my duty to obey the law and you are correct in what you say."

Five minutes later a warning was shouted to Marc Bero and his men to surrender. They replied with gunfire. Then the canon went into action. Its well directed fire at close range started to reduce the fort. The men inside threw down their arms and surrendered. And among them was Marc Bero.

"Whoever gave you the idea of hiring an engineer, digging a new channel and getting the Rio Grande to flow around the fort?" asked Mrs. Betty Willson. There was sweetness in her voice. She had been a widow for three years and now the most famous sheriff of Texas looked like the best bet for her next husband.

"Little Jimmy Polin," explained the sheriff. "He was making new channels for the water while playing with his mud pies. The Rio Grande helped in avenging the death of Jimmy's parents. Ironically, the child himself gave us the idea and never knew it."

Famous Battles Of History

General Custer ★★

IT WAS ON THE MORNING OF JUNE 25, 1876, GENERAL CUSTER AND HIS FAMOUS 7TH REGIMENT SET OUT TO DESTROY THE POWERFUL SIOUX AND CHEYENNE NATION.

WITHIN SIGHT OF THE INDIAN CAMP HE SENT OUT ABOUT A HUNDRED TROOPERS TO ENGAGE THE INDIANS AT ONE END OF THEIR CAMP BEFORE THE TROOPS COULD REACH THEM. THE INDIANS USED THOUSANDS OF ROUNDS OF BULLETS

Sitting Bull

SOLDIERS ALSO ATTACKED THE OTHER END OF CAMP BUT WERE ALSO DRIVEN OFF. THE TIME HAD COME FOR THE INDIANS TO STRIKE. THEY FORDED THE RIVER AND TRAPPED CUSTER FROM ALL SIDES. THE GENERAL AND HIS MEN PUT UP A BRAVE FIGHT, BUT THE INDIANS WERE MANY. SOLDIERS FEW. IN A SHORT TIME OVER 300 TROOPERS HAD BEEN KILLED OR WOUNDED. AMONG THE MANY DEAD WAS GEN. CUSTER, THE MAN WHO SWORE TO CRUSH THE SIOUX AND CHEYENNE NATION.
